' So you want to get TKaraoke USB Key?'Some of the music that comes with this TKaraoke USB is a bit shaky.Q: Can I feed the drain line of a sink with a tap with a temperature sensor? We have a regular American kitchen sink with three faucets. One has a temperature sensor (model PTZ-K1L). The other two faucets don't have a temperature sensor. We've tested the faucets and the temperature sensors work fine. However, when I turn on the water in the sink, a bit of standing water is left in the bottom of the sink. The temperature sensor in one of the three faucets and in the one that doesn't have a temperature sensor measures the temperature of the standing water. Since the temperature of the standing water is always the same temperature, I assume the sensor in the faucet with the temperature sensor measures the temperature of the standing water. Is it possible for me to install a temperature sensor in a tap so it does not measure the temperature of the standing water? I want the tap to always measure the temperature of the tap water. A: There are a few things to consider: If you were to buy a separate thermometer, and put it in the "normally closed" side of the valve, it wouldn't measure the temp of the water that comes out of the tap, but the water that would be in the sink if you were to turn on the tap. A lot of sinks will be like the one you have, and it'll be a sink/drain combo with a "normal" faucet, and a separate line for the "temperature" faucet. If you put the temperature faucet on "normal" or any other setting, you could be wasting water. There are two different ways to set up a "temperature" faucet, and a couple of ways to setup the "normal" faucet. You have a single line with a faucet on the sink, and a pressure balanced T on the "temperature" faucet. You have
